a preview

Annual AAPS meeting expected to draw more than 7,000 scientists

PharmSci360, the annual meeting of the American Association of Pharmaceutical Scientists (AAPS), will take place November 4-7 in Washington, DC. More than 7,000 scientists and other pharmaceutical professionals are expected to attend as well as hundreds of exhibitors, including big and small pharmaceutical manufacturers, CDMOs, and R&D companies.

Education

This year's conference will feature programming about chemical and biomolecular drugs and will specifically focus on preclinical development, bioanalytics, clinical pharmacology, manufacturing and bioprocessing, and formulation and quality. Visitors can attend several educational panels and poster sessions presented by scientists from various universities, pharmaceutical companies, and regulatory organizations from around the world.

On Saturday and Sunday, attendees have the option to participate in day-long short courses for an additional fee. Some of the topics covered in these sessions include the development of fixed-dose combination products, surfactants and biopharmaceuticals, developing generic drug products, regulatory submissions, risk assessment for biologic proteins and peptides, quantitative system pharmacology, and bioanalytical method validation.

The conference officially starts on Sunday at 5:00 pm with an opening plenary session, followed by a welcome reception. Speakers include J. Craig Venter, co-founder and chief executive officer of Human Longevity, a genomics-based health intelligence company, and Dr. Stephen Grupp, director of the cancer immunotherapy program at the Children's Hospital of Philadelphia.
